FRENCH WRITER CALLS WOMEN THE FAVORED SEX BECAUSE OF POSITION

Jean Parigot, France's war poet, author of "Flowers of the Trenches," "The Pollu," and many other songs and verses, has come to America. She's now in New York.

And this Jean is a vital, brown-eyed, auburn-haired woman. Instead of the man her name leads one to expect!

Her name really is Marie Louise Valmalette and she did not write or think of poetry or song until her son was killed in the war.

And then another son was killed. And then her husband. And last of all her daughter died from an illness growing out of war service.

"I have suffered," says Madame Parigot, "and when one suffers one is forced to self-expression else the weight of the burden must destroy its bearer."

"I took a masculine name when I began writing because I did not want to create an atmosphere of cheap sentimentalism about myself and my songs and verses for soldiers."

Her Face Tragic.

"But," and Madame smiled. Her smiles are rare. Her face is rather tragic, much of the time, an impression heightened by her unusual coloring.

"But," she repeated, "I should rather be a woman for one little day than be a man a million years!"

"Ah, yes! Women suffer more because their sensibilities are finer, more delicate."

"But as they suffer more they come to know life better, they live more intensely. A woman lives more in one hour than a man lives in a day. That is why I should rather be a woman."

In spite of repeated requests to do so, Madame Parigot has rarely appeared in public until recently. Her refusal to was due to the fact that she did not wish to reveal herself as a woman.

FORMER MULE BARN NOW HOUSES FLIVVER

MARION, Ill.—The Joab Goodall mule sales barn, known throughout the central west for many years as the largest of its kind, is being converted into a garage, having been leased to a motor sales company.

The Goodall family opened the sales barn in 1888, and each year shipped in hundreds of mules, which later were auctioned off for shipment to the Spanish-American and Boer wars and to the cotton plantations of the South and ranches of the West.

Buyers came hundreds of miles to attend the sales.

GERMANY BUILDS CRAFT FOR U. S.

Zeppelin Will Replace One Allotted but Destroyed in Rhineland; Delivery is Contracted.

VERSAILLES.—Germany will manufacture a Zeppelin of 70,000 metres capacity to replace the one allotted to the United States under the Versailles treaty but destroyed in Germany, under the ward of ambassadors council which allows America three million gold marks in reparation.

The ambassador's award was authorized by the inter-allied council which still has its seat here.

The United States has asked that Germany be ordered to build for it a 100,000 cubic meter Zeppelin, which would have been the largest ever constructed. The war council at first thought a ship of 30,000 cubic metres capacity should be sufficient.

The navy department at Washington found this suggestion inadequate and suggested it be increased to 70,000 metres, which will cost $750,000, making all allowances for exchange. The German government, it is believed, be able to deliver the airship within nine months.

One of the conditions is that a German crew shall take the Zeppelin to the United States, although several company the crew in the flight.

American officers will probably accompany the crew in the flight across the Atlantic.
